News: With daily cases largely flat throughout the month of June, the national outlook remains stable in the United States, though there are fluctuations attributable to delays in Covid reporting over summer holidays. Still, the number of new known cases announced each day in the U.S. remains close to 100,000. The country's cases have remained relatively steady even as some regions have seen increasing caseloads and others have seen conditions improve. In the South and West, cases are increasing. Cases in Mississippi have more than doubled since the start of the month. Hospitalizations are largely unaffected by delays in official reporting over holidays, and they have remained steady in recent weeks. Around 30,000 people are in American hospitals with coronavirus on an average day- a figure that has stayed mostly consistent since the start of the month. In other news, the FDA has approved the 6 month old to 5 year old covid vaccine. We have it in stock now and appointments can be made for Wednesdays.
